

Report on the Herbal Garden and Animal House Visit

The II year MBBS Students attending the Pharmacology department were given an exposure to the animal house and the herbal garden of the institution every year as an initiative of curriculum enrichment. The students actively participated in the visit. During the visit to the herbal garden, the students had the opportunity to explore and learn about various medicinal plants and herbs. They were able to observe the different types of plants, their growth patterns and the specific medicinal properties they possess. The students also had the chance to interact with experts who provided valuable insights and knowledge about the cultivation, harvesting and usage of these herbs. Overall, it was informative and enriching experience for the students to deepen their understanding of herbal medicine and kindle their interest in translational research.

During the visit to the animal house, the second-year MBBS students had the opportunity to gain hands-on experience and knowledge about animal anatomy and physiology. They were able to observe and interact with various laboratory animals, such as mice, rats, and rabbits, which are commonly used in medical research. The students learned about proper handling and care of these animals, as well as the ethical considerations involved in animal experimentation. They also had the chance to witness some basic procedures, such as blood collection and injections, under the guidance of experienced professionals. Overall, it was an educational and insightful visit that allowed the students to better understand the role of animal models in medical research.

The maintenance and optimal temperature and facilities for experimental animals are crucial for their well-being and the accuracy of research results. It is important to provide a suitable environment that meets their specific needs. This includes:

1. Temperature control: Maintaining an appropriate temperature range is essential for the comfort and health of the animals. Different species have different temperature requirements, so it is important to ensure that the temperature is within the optimal range for each species.
2. Housing conditions: The animals should be housed in clean and comfortable cages or enclosures that provide adequate space for movement and natural behaviors. The cages should be properly ventilated to ensure good air quality.
3. Lighting: Providing a proper lighting schedule is important for the animals' circadian rhythms and overall well-being. A regular light-dark cycle should be maintained to mimic natural day-night patterns.
4. Hygiene and sanitation: Regular cleaning and disinfection of the animal housing areas are necessary to prevent the spread of diseases and maintain a healthy environment.
5. Nutrition and water: A balanced and appropriate diet should be provided to meet the nutritional needs of the animals. Access to clean and fresh water should be available at all times.

6. Veterinary care: Regular health checks by a qualified veterinarian are essential to monitor the animals' health and detect any signs of illness or distress. Prompt medical attention should be provided when needed.

Overall, maintaining optimal temperature and facilities for experimental animals is crucial to ensure their well-being and the reliability of research outcomes.
